TITLE: Keep foods safe during and after a power outage – Tips from MSU Extension

For those affected by power outages, here are some tips from Michigan State University Extension to keep your food safe and prevent food borne illnesses.

- Temperatures are considered safe if they are 40 degrees Fahrenheit or lower in the refrigerator or zero degrees or lower in the freezer.
- Keep refrigerator and freezer doors closed as much as possible to maintain the cold temperatures
- An unopened refrigerator will keep food cold for about four hours.
- The refrigerator freezer will keep foods frozen for about a day
- A full freestanding freezer may be safe for 48 hours (1/2 full about 24 hours)
- Buy dry or block ice to keep the refrigerator as cold as possible (50 pounds of dry ice should hold an 18-cubic foot fully-stocked freezer cold for two days
- Meat, poultry, fish, or eggs still at safe temperatures need to be thoroughly cooked to proper temperature to destroy bacteria that could cause a food-borne illness

If at any point the food was above 40 degrees Fahrenheit for two hours or more, discard it. When in doubt, throw it out.
